Pastoral Reflection

The Gift of Doubt

Faith doesn't come naturally to me. In God's eyes, I must be quite the stubborn one, needing constant reassurance of His presence and regularly having questions that I struggle with. Sometimes they might be specific theological questions that pop up, while oftentimes my doubts go back to the very basics of faith - does God even exist, or is He simply a concept I've come to accept, having grown up with Christian beliefs?

Recently, such doubts have returned. I used to wonder if these recurring doubts or questions made me a "weak" Christian, and especially when I was dabbling in ministry work as a staff worker in a Christian university fellowship - How could I be teaching or mentoring others when I myself struggle with such doubts? There are times when I wished to have the gift of faith, when I see some others who appear to not to struggle as much as I do with doubts.

However, I've come to accept that this is simply what my faith looks like. I read a quote by Fyodor Dostoevsky that I resonate with: "It is not as a child that I believe and confess Jesus Christ. My hosanna is born of a furnace of doubt." Perhaps one way of looking at it is that I've been given the gift of doubt. In one sense - I regard it as a gift of being allowed to doubt - that I have a community; friends and family who allow me to express my doubts, to struggle and make sense of it, without fear of judgment. In another sense, it is also a gift as it helps me understand and empathize with what others go through, whether a fellow believer wrestling with difficult questions, or a non-believer having difficulties accepting the gospel.

When I was younger, I used to fear that in the future, I would eventually lose my faith, and a regular prayer (which I still pray) is “I believe; help my unbelief...” Thankfully, years later, by God’s grace, I still believe.

“Be merciful to those who doubt;” (Jude 1:22)
A reminder to myself not to judge others (nor myself) who are struggling with doubt, but to be open and submit our struggles to God, and to trust that He who began in a good work in us will carry it to completion, until Christ returns.
